

Highlights

- We examine cremation practice in military sites in the north of England using macro- and microscopic methods on bone
- Innovative use of crystallinity indices suggests consistency of cremation practice
- Variation in associated artefacts suggests individuals still maintained non-military aspects of their identity.